Experiments addressing two specific aims are described herein. In aim 1, a large-scale mutagenesis screen will be conducted in C57BL/6 mice to discover novel genes involved in male fertility.

This screen will be performed using a knockout approach. The candidates will be functionally validated by creating mutations in mice via homologous recombination. Males carrying a mutation in a novel gene will be tested for alterations in sperm counts. A sperm chromatin assay will be used to evaluate the role of the gene product in sperm chromatin decondensation. An alternative method is also described, which allows for the detection of sperm that are defective at a step between chromatin decondensation and nuclear shaping. Aim 2 is to determine the role of the nuclear remodeling and histone deacetylation histone deacetylase enzymes in germ cell development, using a novel Cre-mediated gene-targeting approach.
